

Red Herrings

Lynne Chatterton gives us glimpses of her life as she progressed from a small outback town in Australia where she grew vines and oranges to a small farm near a very small village in Umbria, Italy, where she and her husband Brian now live and produce olive oil. Life on the land has been a constant in this journey. The Chattertons have protested farming interests as farmers themselves, represented farmers in government, helped Arab farmers to find a better way of farming in the Middle East and North Africa, and championed the cause of farmers in the international agencies. But this is not a book about farming it is a reflection of change and its consequences. Fate has many surprises in store for all this is an account of one life and a chain of events that created many challenges some of which were overcome and some of which remain to be resolved. Review of the paper back edition: Lynne Chatterton and her husband Brian have devoted many years to promoting and explaining dryland farming methods to people in the Middle East and Mediterranean. So much time there, and so little home in Australia provoked a move to an olive grove in Umbria (local metrop. Orvieto) Red Herrings is a record of all these activities: negotiations, interactions and parties in embassies, ministries and high commissions, etc.; much travelling and meeting people - eating their food; much adventure in becoming Italian - even to the extent of being on the local-history committee, true sign of belonging. Lynne Chatterton is good at puncturing stuffed shirts, quick to spot male chauvinism, and hard on colonial hangovers. It is surprising how vigorous these weeds remain. Her liberal sensibilities are often affronted and we suffer with her. It is a most interesting take on life that is at once intensely rooted and local and yet flies far above mundane national boundaries: a model for us all. Tom Jaine in Petits propos culinaires

Lynne Chatterton has written Sustainable Dryland Farming, (Cambridge University Press), From the ground up home cooking without fear (Pulcini Press) and numerous other books, articles and broadcasts on food, farming, politics and living in Italy.
