

The Theatres of Paris (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Theatres of Paris Good Americans, we are told, when they die go to Paris. It is to be feared that a many of the few bad ones who may exist take time by the forelock, and spend their days and nights in Paris now, alive and in the flesh. As a guide to both these classes of my countrymen this little book is intended. It is meant for the reader who - to use Mr. Lowells apt phrase - has travelled only at his own fireside, as well as for the reader who is wont often to cross the water. The title is taken from a short article on the Theatres of Paris, presented in the Art Journal last fall. From this article, as well as from others contributed to Scribners, Lippincotts, and Appletons Magazines, and to the Nation I have not hesitated to borrow freely now and then whatever might aid me in the composition of the following chapters.
