Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: ...arguments adduced by Conception (Hist, de Philipinas, viii, pp. 41-43), showing that the decree of Clement IX forbade trade to all ecclesiastics, but did not authorize the ordinary to inflict penalties therefor on the members of the religious orders, that being reserved to their own superiors the ordinary, in such cases, being empowered only to apply the confiscated goods for pious purposes. 70 Murillo Velarde and Concepcion give this name as Pizarraldi; and Diaz makes it Lizarraldi. 71 In the Dominican chapter-session of 1673, it was enacted that no religious of that order should become executor of a deceased persons estate, or undertake the charge of his last will. This was to prevent risk of accusations against the friars, so general was the dishonest administration of executorships in Manila-so much so that it occasioned no surprise in the minds of the people, although all complained of the grievances thus caused. There are few fortunes which have not some executorship as the foundation. See Salazars Hist. Sant. Rosario (Manila, 1742), p. 43. 72 It had begun in 1672, in the time of Archbishop Lopez, under whom judgment was rendered in favor of Sarmiento; but Lopez's death in 1674 prevented the execution of the sentence. Various delays ensued, and Cordero died, being succeeded by Ortega as executor. (Salazar, Hist. Sant. Rosario, p. 236.) 73 Also written Carballo, Carvallo, and Caballero. 74 Spanish dote, usually meaning dowry; but as the ecclesiastic Cordero was the legatee of Dona Maria de Roa (Montero y Vidal, i, p. 368), the word evidently means the bequest to him, perhaps for the pious purposes mentioned later in this document. 75 See Conceptions
